known fact that more intellect, wit, amiability and loveable qualities have been found to exist among what are termed 'little men,' than have been discovered among the large, sinewy, hony, laxy, stupid lords of creation, who take every opportunity to vaunt their imaginary superiority, and wound the feelings of many who are infinitely superior to them in every respect, except the length, breadth and weight of a body which is universally owned to be an incumbrance to those who possess it. Little men in general, from an inward conviction NO. 27, of their deficiency in the bone and sinew department, make an effort and succeed in developing a number of decidedly admirable qualities which more than compensate for their loss. For this reason they are held in high virtue of his protection, paraphrase ering all these advantages, I do not think we have any reason to compassionate them, or that they by any means feel it incumbent on them to
